HOW DO YOU KNOW WHAT SIZE SURFBOARD TO GET

Enjoy surfing! As a general rule of thumb, the right surfboard for an intermediate surfer is usually one palm higher than his height. If you ride small-to-medium sized waves, you can pick a longboard of a funboard/malibu.

HOW THICK SHOULD MY SURFBOARD BE

The beginner is going to want to look for something that has a lot of volume and stability. For most, the perfect starter surfboard is going to be something somewhere around 7-8 foot in length, at least 55.88cm wide and around 7.62cm thick.

WHAT IS A FUNBOARD SURFING

Funboards- Surfboards designed for beginners from 0 to advanced surfers searching for a smooth & fun surfing . The beginner boards are shaped to provide length, stability, easy paddling and take-off whilst remaining fluid and agile. Catch more waves and maximize surf practice time without frustration.

SELECTING THE PERFECT SURFBOARD

Whatever you are a beginner, intermediate or expert surfer, choosing the right board for your abilities and the conditions is crucial to having a successful, fun surfing experience.

The intermediate to expert surfer is generally going to have a pretty good idea about what they need to take out in any given wave type or conditions. The novice surfer, however, probably doesn't have this knowledge yet and may not realize what they need.

There is no surfboard that is perfect for one person on all types of waves or conditions. If you are going to be surfing on a regular basis, it's a good idea to build yourself a quiver of different boards of all shapes and sizes.

If you're starting out, you're probably only going to need one good beginner surfboard. However, in no time, you're going to advance enough to refine your surfboard choice to ensure you avoid surfing the wrong board.

There are several factors you must consider when choosing the right surfboard for any given day.

First and foremost, your skill level as a surfer. Are you a beginner, an intermediate or an expert surfer? There's no point surfing a high performance shortboard if you can't stand up.

Next would be your fitness level. Even at advanced levels of surfing, if you are not particularly fit, you may need to consider a board with a little more volume to maximize your wave count and session length.

Your size – your height and weight – which will help determine how much volume you would need for a style of board.

And finally, the type of waves you will be surfing. Are they going to be fast and hollow or soft, slow and crumbly? Different waves are going to need different boards.

All these factors are going to play a role in your surfing performance. While you may already consider each of these things at one time or another make sure you revisit these ideas when selecting your next surfboard for your dream quiver.

KNEELO

Gathering
April 2017

A group of kneeboard surfers (or Kneelos as they like to be called) had a sort of annual 'Gathering' over the Workers Day week, here in Elands Bay.

Based at the Witmosselpot, they travelled and enjoyed the multiple of quality waves up and down the coast.

At an informal function, Gigs Celliers who is the international star of the group, was welcoming everyone and gave a 3 minute history of the sport and its influence on the better known 'stand up' version of surfing. Then he sprung his surprise and called up two of the elders in the sport, Paddy Laroque and Lawrence Atkinson. There he presented them with their old boards from 1983. Somewhere and somehow he'd spirited these iconic boards out of the mist of history. Better let them tell you what happened.

Paddy
"Gobsmacked!"

Absolutely gobsmacked.

What confuses me is 'Why did I ever get rid of that board?' And how did Gigs find these boards?

That's 1984 . . . 33 years ago!"
"Oh, and that's Gigs' absolute commitment to the sport. That he would find the boards, remember who's they were and their full history, buy them, hoard them and produce them on a special occasion."

"I now wonder what else has he got hidden away?"

Lawrence
"I just had a silly smile on my face and everyone else in the room disappeared. I walked in a daze over to one of my favourite and most memorable boards ever. The 'LA board'. What was it doing here?"

"One year after Simon Anderson invented the thruster surfboard I was into my second iteration – and there it was in front of me. Again."

By Lawrence Atkinson

The nonstanding versions of surfing were more popular during the sport's dark decades in the 19th century, when Western-borne disease, religion and politics decimated the number of surfers in Hawaii and other Pacific island groups. (All three surfers in "Sandwich Islanders Playing in the Surf," a 1841 drawing, are riding on their knees.) Stand-up riding then became synonymous with surfing during the sport's early 20th-century renaissance; while kneeboarding was undoubtedly a part of the surf scene, it was all but unmentioned as a surfing subcategory until the late '50s, and didn't gain any real popularity until the mid-'60s.

Kneeboarders often say they chose their version of the sport over stand-up surfing because of the increased sensation of speed that comes from riding closer to the water surface. In decades past, kneeboards were more maneuverable by far than regular boards, were easier to fit into tight sections on the wave.
